Responde, Garante, Extra. Video The first known written use of these words is in the Podd'ystrun (or Peddars Tudor), an 11th-century Anglo-Saxon manuscript, believed to have been copied around 1030. The term is derived from roll-a-pen, which derives from the German and Dutch words "rolleren" and "rolgen". It is noted that a similar form of "catullus" (Latin for "i.e." or "e.g.") is used in traditional Germanic languages. Share This! A recent post on Patco Trolley sent me down a rabbit hole of research on the history of trolleys, and what a fascinating ride it was. A carousel of images, a parade of dates, and a sea of names went down as I combed through, and I'm so grateful to the people who've gone to the trouble of leaving their photos, newspapers and memories online. I did a lot of research on the history of trolleys in DC, and I'm indebted to the following people for sharing what they know, and hopefully, learning a thing or two in the process: Adam Koons, who's blog was the first one I looked at, and did a lot to educate me on this subject. Annette Horning, who did a lot to help me track down that one really rare photo I was looking for. Jil Howard, who helped me learn the history of trolley lines in DC – and much more. And a few of the locals – like this guy who left a comment after I posted a photo on Patco Trolley: He was kind enough to leave this in the comments section: "Called the DC Transit System, the District's first trolley system was built in 1890. The DC Street Railway Company took out a $1.2 million bond offering in 1890, to be paid off over 30 years. It began service on May 25, 1890 between the National Mall (the site of the Washington Monument) and the Navy Yard, making it the first streetcar
