Energy-related problems can be significant, particularly for airplanes. For example, energy-related problems are a problem that is addressed by airplanes that have been built or may be built. In some cases, energy-related problems are addressed by aircraft manufacturers before a plane has even been built or assembled. One example is a plane having an electric motor/generator or another electric power generating device or system (e.g., including a fuel cell). However, energy-related problems can be particularly pronounced for new airplanes. In some cases, new airplanes are available or tend to have significant energy-related issues. It can be difficult to make changes to an airplane to address energy-related issues. For example, airplanes tend to have a complex structure, and it can be difficult to add an energy-related device or system. Accordingly, energy-related issues can make particular airplanes expensive to develop, and, in particular, expensive to build. In some cases, FAA regulations may require that an airplane be grounded. In some cases, aircraft manufacturers try to avoid grounding airplanes, even if an airplane has an energy-related issue. For example, airplane manufacturers may try to minimize any impact that an airplane grounding will have on production of the airplane. However, grounding may be needed to address the energy-related problem. Further, when an airplane is grounded, the airplane is unavailable for use. Moreover, airplane manufacturers may have a particular airplane in mind for an energy-related problem that they desire to solve. Typically, the airplane manufacturer will want to be first in having an energy-related issue addressed. The headings provided herein are for convenience only and 09e8f5149f
